The Photoshop software application can be used for a variety of purposes, including retouching, image manipulation, and compositing. It's a very flexible program. The following sections describe how to use Photoshop with a variety of subjects, including portraits, special effects, and animation. Retouching In photography, retouching is the process of making changes to a digital image. You can use Photoshop for retouching a number of photographic subjects. You can change the focus of your subject and correct for exposure problems. You can also make adjustments to color or contrast, blur (soften) an image, remove small objects, repair tears and scratches, reduce pixilation, and add special effects. When working with portraits or other subjects that include people, you can always soften skin to make it more pleasing and more flattering to the subject. Making the Selections That You'll Need To retouch an image, you must first select the objects that you want to change or remove from the original photo. Elements 10 enables you to select objects using keyboard shortcuts and tools. For more information on how to select objects, see the nearby sidebar "Selecting objects and parts of objects." Preparing Your Images for a Blur To soften skin, you use a tool called Gaussian Blur, which is available in the Filter⇒Blur menu. You can apply a Gaussian Blur to images that have objects in them. Elements 10 also enables you to use some commands to blur images without actually altering the image itself. You have a choice of several methods for blurring. Most common are the following: Blur method: Applies a fairly standard radial blur filter to your image. Blurring removes sharp details and makes softening the edges and edges of skin. This method is quick but doesn't give the best results in many cases. Gaussian Blur: An improved version of the blurring method, Gaussian Blur softens the image's edges, but it also sharpens image detail, making a blur that looks more pleasing to the eye than other blurs. Motion Blur: Also known as a motion blur. It looks best when you're blurring an object moving away from you (or toward you). The Blur method gives you a larger area to select on

What's New In Photoshop CS4?

Q: Identifying a car's year This is a tough one, but it's probably something I've seen on shows. There are no other ways to identify the make or model (Chrysler, Mini, Volvo, etc.) unless they were advertising a 'safety' feature, but that's not very likely. Since this was advertised in 1980, I'd say this is a 2000/2001 model. The engine is very small. There is a very serious looking nameplate that looks similar to the names on cars today, although the letters are shaped differently. A: There's a few things that a driver of the period might have seen on American television. The first is some sort of warning that there was a vehicle ahead somewhere, and the warning was perhaps optional. I can't quite recall which show it was in, but it was in one of the early seasons of Saved by the Bell. If I remember correctly, and that was my first thought, it was an alert on the dash, or a warning to the driver to be aware of something up ahead. With all the light-emitting diodes that are backlit, I don't think that was necessary. The only thing that might be different is that the BEEHIVE symbol would have been less prominent than they are today. I can't remember what the warning was, if the BEEHIVE symbol was an icon or part of the warning, but I do remember it being optional. The next thing would be a warning to stay in the left lane on a multi-lane road. Again, I can't remember if the BEEHIVE symbol was part of the warning or just a yellow line with a symbol on it, but I do remember this being on an episode of the first Saved by the Bell film. And I remember it on some of the early seasons of Full House. The last warning that the driver might have seen, is the road sign with the red hazard triangles. There may have been warning about the specific road ahead that was hazardous, but that was rare. The more common hazard was debris on the road. And the triangle was warning that there might be a hazardous object ahead. And it usually wasn't included in the image, unless it was the show's logo that was safe, but it could be an additional hazard. I do remember seeing those a couple of times, and I think that was in one of the early seasons of Saved by
